Introduction:

Death penalty has been a controversial topic in the international community for centuries. It is a widely debated issue as to whether it should be allowed or abolished completely, with both sides making convincing arguments.

First, we will explore the concept of the death penalty, draw attention to its history and provide an overview of its relevance today. Following this, we will look at various arguments in favor of, as well as against the death penalty. Finally, we will draw a conclusion by summarizing the main points discussed throughout the essay and making clear our stance on the issue.

Body:

The death penalty, or capital punishment as it is sometimes referred to, is the legal act of execution for those convicted of severe crimes. The practice has been used since ancient times and continues to be employed in many countries today, although there is much debate over its continued use. Proponents of the death penalty argue that it is an effective deterrent for serious crimes such as murder, and can prevent further harm to the community. In contrast, opponents of the death penalty claim that it is cruel and unusual punishment, as well as ineffective in reducing crime rates.

Proponents of the death penalty argue that it acts as a powerful deterrent for criminals considering committing serious offences. The idea is that the threat of execution will outweigh any potential benefits of engaging in criminal activities, thus discouraging people from committing them. Additionally, supporters claim that capital punishment can bring closure and justice to victims' family members who have suffered due to the crime committed.

Opponents of the death penalty argue that it is a cruel and unusual form of punishment that fails to provide justice or closure for the families of victims. They also point out that it is expensive to maintain and there is a risk of innocent people being executed due to mistakes in the judicial system. Moreover, opponents question whether the death penalty truly acts as an effective deterrent against crime, with some studies suggesting it has little effect on reducing crime rates.

Conclusion:

In conclusion, the death penalty has been a topic of debate for centuries and continues to be so today. Both proponents and opponents make valid points in support of their respective arguments, however it is clear that more research needs to be done in order to reach a definitive conclusion on the matter. The death penalty is a complex issue and any decision made should be a well-thought out one, taking into account all of the arguments from both sides. After consideration of all of the facts, it is our opinion that the death penalty should not be used in any form as it does not provide justice or closure for victims' families and can lead to the execution of innocent people.
